Architecture of the sharing culture

In a sharing culture, individuals participate in sustained practices of togetherness characterized by the co-creation, co-management, co-ownership and co-consumption of resources. Crucial to this sharing process is the recognition of architectural spaces as both a shareable asset and an enabler of effective sharing activities.

Our speculation presents a series of hypothetical realities of future Singapore. This is where new forms of shared spaces at varying scales and new space-sharing practices are explored to tackle a multitude of challenges that the country faces. Altogether, they depict a new urban landscape of Singapore that enables us to reinvent ourselves towards greater liveability and sustainability, while confronting the limits of density and resources.
